The most talked-about party at the Democrats’ biennial gathering in Detroit this week was not the official event, but the campaign finance plan proposed by New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer.

The plan was born of the success of "Fahrenheit 9/11," the documentary film that was released last year and made more than $48 million. Mr. Spitzer, who was an investor in the film, said he had been inspired by the movie's box office returns and decided to propose a similar "campaign finance revolution" in New York.

"The election rules are outdated and have failed to keep up with technology," Mr. Spitzer said at a news conference. "We need to modernize the rules and ensure that all citizens have an equal voice in the political process.

Mr. Spitzer’s plan would allow candidates to raise money through small donations, limit the amount of money they can spend on ads and prevent lobbyists from giving large donations.

"This is a first step in changing the way we finance our politics," Mr. Spitzer said.

Democratic leaders praised the plan, saying it was a step in the right direction. "We need to ensure that every voice is heard," said Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid.

But Republicans were critical of the plan, saying it would give an unfair advantage to candidates who can raise money through small donations.

"This is a giveaway to the special interests," said Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell.

Mr. Spitzer said he plans to introduce the plan in the next legislative session and is already working with lawmakers to pass it.

"We are committed to making our elections more fair and transparent," he said.

---

The most talked-about party at the Democrats’ biennial gathering in Detroit this week was not the official event, but the campaign finance plan proposed by New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer.

The plan was born of the success of "Fahrenheit 9/11," the documentary film that was released last year and made more than $48 million. Mr. Spitzer, who was an investor in the film, said he had been inspired by the movie’s box office returns and decided to propose a similar “campaign finance revolution” in New York.

“The election rules are outdated and have failed to keep up with technology,” Mr. Spitzer said at a news conference. “We need to modernize the rules and ensure that all citizens have an equal voice in the political process.

Mr. Spitzer’s plan would allow candidates to raise money through small donations, limit the amount of money they can spend on ads and prevent lobbyists from giving large donations.

“This is a first step in changing the way we finance our politics,” Mr. Spitzer said.

Democratic leaders praised the plan, saying it was a step in the right direction. “We need to ensure that every voice is heard,” said Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid.

But Republicans were critical of the plan, saying it would give an unfair advantage to candidates who can raise money through small donations.

“This is a giveaway to the special interests,” said Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell.

Mr. Spitzer said he plans to introduce the plan in the next legislative session and is already working with lawmakers to pass it.

“We are committed to making our elections more fair and transparent,” he said.

---

The most talked-about party at the Democrats’ biennial gathering in Detroit this week was not the official event, but the campaign finance plan proposed by New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer.

The plan was born of the success of “Fahrenheit 9/11,” the documentary film that was released last year and made more than $48 million. Mr. Spitzer, who was an investor in the film, said he had been inspired by the movie’s box office returns and decided to propose a similar “campaign finance revolution” in New York.

“The election rules are outdated and have failed to keep up with technology,” Mr. Spitzer said at a news conference. “We need to modernize the rules and ensure that all citizens have an equal voice in the political process.

Mr. Spitzer’s plan would allow candidates to raise money through small donations, limit the amount of money they can spend on ads and prevent lobbyists from giving large donations.

“This is a first step in changing the way we finance our politics,” Mr. Spitzer said.

Democratic leaders praised the plan, saying it was a step in the right direction. “We need to ensure that every voice is heard,” said Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid.

But Republicans were critical of the plan, saying it would give an unfair advantage to candidates who can raise money through small donations.

“This is a giveaway to the special interests,” said Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell.

Mr. Spitzer said he plans to introduce the plan in the next legislative session and is already working with lawmakers to pass it.

“We are committed to making our elections more fair and transparent,” he said.

---

The most talked-about party at the Democrats’ biennial gathering in Detroit this week was not the official event, but the campaign finance plan proposed by New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer.

The plan was born of the success of “Fahrenheit 9/11,” the documentary film that was released last year and made more than $48 million. Mr. Spitzer, who was an investor in the film, said he had been inspired by the movie’s box office returns and decided to propose a similar “campaign finance revolution” in New York.

“The election rules are outdated and have failed to keep up with technology,” Mr. Spitzer said at a news conference. “We need to modernize the rules and ensure that all citizens have an equal voice in the political process.

Mr. Spitzer’s plan would allow candidates to raise money through small donations, limit the amount of money they can spend on ads and prevent lobbyists from giving large donations.

“This is a first step in changing the way we finance our politics,” Mr. Spitzer said.

Democratic leaders praised the plan, saying it was a step in the right direction. “We need to ensure that every voice is heard,” said Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid.

But Republicans were critical of the plan, saying it would give an unfair advantage to candidates who can raise money through small donations.

“This is a giveaway to the special interests,” said Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell.

Mr. Spitzer said he plans to introduce the plan in the next legislative session and is already working with lawmakers to pass it.

“We are committed to making our elections more fair and transparent,” he said.

---

The most talked-about party at the Democrats’ biennial gathering in Detroit this week was not the official event, but the campaign finance plan proposed by New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer.

The plan was born of the success of “Fahrenheit 9/11,” the documentary film that was released last year and made more than $48 million. Mr. Spitzer, who was an investor in the film, said he had been inspired by the movie’s box office returns and decided to propose a similar “campaign finance revolution” in New York.

“The election rules are outdated and have failed to keep up with technology,” Mr. Spitzer said at a news conference. “We need to modernize the rules and ensure that all citizens have an equal voice in the political process.

Mr. Spitzer’s plan would allow candidates to raise money through small donations, limit the amount of money they can spend on ads and prevent lobbyists from giving large donations.

“This is a first step in changing the way we finance our politics,” Mr. Spitzer said.

Democratic leaders praised the plan, saying it was a step in the right direction. “We need to ensure that every voice is heard,” said Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid.

But Republicans were critical of the plan, saying it would give an unfair advantage to candidates who can raise money through small donations.

“This is a giveaway to the special interests,” said Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell.

Mr. Spitzer said he plans to introduce the plan in the next legislative session and is already working with lawmakers to pass it.

“We are committed to making our elections more fair and transparent,” he said.

---

The most talked-about party at the Democrats’ biennial gathering in Detroit this week was not the official event, but the campaign finance plan proposed by New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer.

The plan was born of the success of “Fahrenheit 9/11,” the documentary film that was released last year and made more than $48 million. Mr. Spitzer, who was an investor in the film, said he had been inspired by the movie’s box office returns and decided to propose a similar “campaign finance revolution” in New York.

“The election rules are outdated and have failed to keep up with technology,” Mr. Spitzer said at a news conference. “We need to modernize the rules and ensure that all citizens have an equal voice in the political process.

Mr. Spitzer’s plan would allow candidates to raise money through small donations, limit the amount of money they can spend on ads and prevent lobbyists from giving large donations.

“This is a first step in changing the way we finance our politics,” Mr. Spitzer said.

Democratic leaders praised the plan, saying it was a step in the right direction. “We need to ensure that every voice is heard,” said Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid.

But Republicans were critical of the plan, saying it would give an unfair advantage to candidates who can raise money through small donations.

“This is a giveaway to the special interests,” said Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell.

Mr. Spitzer said he plans to introduce the plan in the next legislative session and is already working with lawmakers to pass it.

“We are committed to making our elections more fair and transparent,” he said.

---

The most talked-about party at the Democrats’ biennial gathering in Detroit this week was not the official event, but the campaign finance plan proposed by New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer.

The plan was born of the success of “Fahrenheit 9/11,” the documentary film that was released last year and made more than $48 million. Mr. Spitzer, who was an investor in the film, said he had been inspired by the movie’s box office returns and decided to propose a similar “campaign finance revolution” in New York.

“The election rules are outdated and have failed to keep up with technology,” Mr. Spitzer said at a news conference. “We need to modernize the rules and ensure that all citizens have an equal voice in the political process.

Mr. Spitzer’s plan would allow candidates to raise money through small donations, limit the amount of money they can spend on ads and prevent lobbyists from giving large donations.

“This is a first step in changing the way we finance our politics,” Mr. Spitzer said.

Democratic leaders praised the plan, saying it was a step in the right direction. “We need to ensure that every voice is heard,” said Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid.

But Republicans were critical of the plan, saying it would give an unfair advantage to candidates who can raise money through small donations.

“This is a giveaway to the special interests,” said Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell.

Mr. Spitzer said he plans to introduce the plan in the next legislative session and is already working with lawmakers to pass it.

“We are committed to making our elections more fair and transparent,” he said.

---

The most talked-about party at the Democrats’ biennial gathering in Detroit this week was not the official event, but the campaign finance plan proposed by New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer.

The plan was born of the success of “Fahrenheit 9/11,” the documentary film that was released last year and made more than $48 million. Mr. Spitzer, who was an investor in the film, said he had been inspired by the movie’s box office returns and decided to propose a similar “campaign finance revolution” in New York.

“The election rules are outdated and have failed to keep up with technology,” Mr. Spitzer said at a news conference. “We need to modernize the rules and ensure that all citizens have an equal voice in the political process.

Mr. Spitzer’s plan would allow candidates to raise money through small donations, limit the amount of money they can spend on ads and prevent lobbyists from giving large donations.

“This is a first step in changing the way we finance our politics,” Mr. Spitzer said.

Democratic leaders praised the plan, saying it was a step in the right direction. “We need to ensure that every voice is heard,” said Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid.

But Republicans were critical of the plan, saying it would give an unfair advantage to candidates who can raise money through small donations.

“This is a giveaway to the special interests,” said Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell.

Mr. Spitzer said he plans to introduce the plan in the next legislative session and is already working with lawmakers to pass it.

“We are committed to making our elections more fair and transparent,” he said.