Mr. Spitzer’s Allies

By John H. Makin

Concern among al-Qaeda leaders has been growing that the group’s brand of political violence now has less going for it than it did in the early 1990s, a decade marked by the trade embargo that hit the Soviet Union and led the country to the brink of collapse. Perhaps the most obvious reason is that the U.S. has already been subjected to a number of terrorist attacks, and it is unlikely that the U.S. will ever be able to stop the threat of terrorism again. The U.S. government has also become less willing to tolerate or support such attacks, making it more likely that any such attack will be greeted with widespread condemnation and repercussions.

While the current administration has been more willing to tolerate or support such attacks, it is unlikely that the U.S. will ever be able to stop the threat of terrorism again. The U.S. government has also become less willing to tolerate or support such attacks, making it more likely that any such attack will be greeted with widespread condemnation and repercussions.

The dilemma faced by the U.S. is that it has been subjected to a number of terrorist attacks, and it is unlikely that the U.S. will ever be able to stop the threat of terrorism again. The U.S. government has also become less willing to tolerate or support such attacks, making it more likely that any such attack will be greeted with widespread condemnation and repercussions.

For a Few Dollars More

The deaths of Osama bin Laden again raise the question of what, if anything, should be done about the Palestinian Intifada. The Intifada is now in its fourth year, and thousands of Palestinians have been killed or injured in the conflict. The Intifada has also damaged the reputation of the Palestinian Authority, which is seen by many as unable to provide adequate security for its citizens.

There are many aspects to this problem but none is more important than the fact that the Intifada is a major obstacle to the peace process and the long-term stability of the region. The Intifada is now in its fourth year, and thousands of Palestinians have been killed or injured in the conflict. The Intifada has also damaged the reputation of the Palestinian Authority, which is seen by many as unable to provide adequate security for its citizens.
