The United States of America's weapons of choice are \textit{not} biological weapons. For example, the United States has never been accused of using biological weapons in conflicts. The phrase was used in reference to the United States' weapons of choice being used in the 2003 invasion of Iraq, where it was claimed that Iraq had weapons of mass destruction. However, this statement is false and not supported by evidence. It is important to factually correct such statements and ensure that accurate information is shared.

The phrase "the United States of America's weapons of choice are \textit{not} biological weapons" is an incorrect statement and should not be used.