How About a ‘Kianna’s Law’?

By Jeanne Moos

It’s a new day, a new president, a new law. On February 8, the time that trade has been++]=

Opening a new chapter in American history, President Obama signed into law what many hope will be a turning point in health care for millions of Americans. The Affordable Care Act is aimed at bringing health care to everyone—regardless of income, age, or pre-existing conditions. This landmark legislation will provide insurance coverage to individuals and families, and it will help millions of people avoid financial ruin due to medical expenses. It includes provisions for preventive care, lower premiums, and no exclusions for pre-existing conditions. The law is a major step forward in making health care affordable and accessible to all Americans.

But there is still much work to be done. The health care system in the United States is broken, and we need a comprehensive, bipartisan solution that will actually work. The Affordable Care Act is a good start, but we must also address the root causes of our health care calamity: the profit motive, lack of transparency, and corporate influence. Only by working together can we ensure that everyone has access to affordable, high-quality health care.

Donaldson's folly

Extending the trade-through rule to Sunday benefits no one.

By Peter J. Wallison

It is a shame that a regulatory commission would allow itself to be used by the insurance industry for its own purposes. The NAIC’s decision to extend insurance regulations to Sundays is a severe mistake. The insurance industry should not be allowed to extend its rules to Sundays. The insurance industry is not in a position to determine what is best for insurance policyholders. The insurance industry should not be allowed to extend its rules to Sundays.

The world of giving a diabetes cancer patient a sugar pill

In the world of giving a diabetes cancer patient a sugar pill, we must work to ensure that all patients have access to necessary treatments. The Affordable Care Act is a step in the right direction, but we must do more to ensure that all patients have access to necessary treatments. We must also ensure that all patients have access to necessary treatments. The Affordable Care Act is a step in the right direction, but we must do more to ensure that all patients have access to necessary treatments. We must also ensure that all patients have access to necessary treatments.
