Hollywood seems to have it in for Los Angeles in films such as Earthquake and Them!. In the original War

Ramona
04:05
The novel Ramona - once required reading in California schools - painted a romantic picture of Indians, Mexicans, and padres in the latter half of the 19th century confronted by the arriving Americans who exploit them. The story itself involves an Indian who falls in love with the half-Indian Ramona. Tragic consequences for the couple ensue at the hands of the Yankees. Ramona pageants were common in California at one time. Several films, some silent, were made of the story. A hit song, Ramona (not the one in this video), became popular.

Student unrest in the late 1960s affected many college and university campuses including San Francisco State College (now San Francisco State University). College President S.I. Hayakawa became a national figure by disrupting a student demonstration in 1968, as this interview shows. As a result of his new high profile, Hayakawa was eventually elected (Republican) U.S. Senator from California in 1976. He served one term.

Construction of the Owens Valley Project (the Los Angeles Aqueduct) began in the first decade of the 20th century. It was considered one of the engineering marvels of the era, rivaling the Panama Canal. (The movie “Chinatown” is based on the project but reset in the 1930s. The movie version is highly fictionalized. See S. Erie, "Beyond Chinatown" (Stanford U Press, 2006).

Thirst
09:50
The Southern California Metropolitan Water District produced a short film - "Thirst" - to persuade voters in the 1930s to approve the Colorado River Aqueduct. Two prospectors face death in the desert without water. The moral was that similar fates awaited voters who failed to endorse the proposed water project. The film was shown in movie theaters in the region. Voters endorsed the new aqueduct.

A Metrolink commuter train crashed into a freight train in the Chatsworth area of Los Angeles on Sept. 12, 2008. The Los Angeles Fire Dept. made available a sample of 911 calls from this incident. This is the most dramatic of the calls. Apart from the crash itself, the call illustrates the importance of such emergency services.

Although in decline, the Los Angeles streetcar system was still sufficiently extensive in the early 1950s so that "every schoolchild" would recognize the trolleys. Perhaps for that reason, the L.A. school system made this 78 rpm record drawing inspiration for good posture from streetcars. "Posture Paul" may be the school system's chief contribution to annoying music. The disappearance of the streetcars in the early 1960s sent Posture Paul into oblivion. It is doubtful that the later revival of light rail in L.A. will see his return.

Whenever gasoline prices increase, the first news reports in Los Angeles inevitably say that residents will never get out of their cars. Then there begin to be reports that indeed people do respond by using more public transit. The fact that as time passes, people respond more to price changes than they do in the short run is not a surprise to economists, however.

California Budget Crisis & Budget Delay of the Early 1990s
03:10
When Pete Wilson was elected governor in 1990, the state was already in a budget crisis. The crisis was related to the national recession and the end of Cold War military spending. It was originally thought the crisis would not last long. But this video clip shows that the state was still in a crisis in 1992. The budget, which is supposed to be enacted by July 1, was not signed due to stalemate between the governor and legislature until early Sept. Some state bills were paid during the period without a budget by IOUs.

Orange County, California Bankruptcy of the Mid-1990s
06:47
Orange County, California had a municipal investment pool which seemingly could pay high returns relative to other such pools. However, high yield is a sign of risk and the high yields in the O.C. case resulted from speculation, in part using derivatives. When county treasurer Bob Citron's bet on interest rate did not pay off, the County had to file for bankruptcy. County voters rejected a tax increase to pay off the debt. Ultimately, repayment was financed by recovery bonds and a settlement from Merrill Lynch. Citron used a mental incompetency defense and ultimately served no time.

Calif. Radio Ad Opposes Public Pension Limitation Initiative
01:00
Radio and TV ads are often used in California initiative campaigns. This radio ad - aired Sept. 2007 - is somewhat unusual in that it seeks to prevent the petition from gaining sufficient signatures. In 2005, Governor Schwarzenegger, as part of the "Year of Reform" campaign, proposed a series of initiatives, all of which failed. One, which never made it to the ballot due to a drafting problem, was a limit on public pensions. The new version - circulated in 2007 - is not backed by the governor. Its backers are former Assemblyman Keith Richman and Orange County Supervisor John Moorlach. The ad was sponsored by a union which represents police in Los Angeles.

California's Proposition 13: Early Reports
06:12
California's Proposition 13 of 1978 cut property taxes and required a two-thirds vote for raising state taxes, among other features. The first clip shows the situation just before the June 1978 election. The second shows the legislative bailout of local governments shortly before Prop 13 was to take effect. Later, when the state's economy turned down in the early 1980s, the ability of the state to continue the bailouts was undermined by a squeeze on tax revenue.

00:53
Howard Jarvis, co-sponsor of California's Proposition 13 - did a cameo role in "Airplane." (Prop 13 cut property taxes substantially in 1978 and made raising other taxes more difficult. Prop 13 is often viewed as the starting point for the "taxpayer revolt" of the era.) During the opening credits, Jarvis gets into a taxi, but the driver (leaving the meter going) runs into the airport and gets on a plane. After the final credits, Jarvis is still waiting for his ride.
http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=fP_m7BoYDBY
California's Proposition 13 (1978) drastically reduced property taxes and used the purchase price - not the current assessed market value - as the assessment base. Thus, in a period of rising real estate prices, properties purchased more recently pay higher taxes than properties purchased in the past. The proposition was initially unsuccessfully challenged at the California Supreme Court. It was challenged - also unsuccessfully - much later in 1992 at the U.S. Supreme Court. The challenge was based on the unequal assessments of otherwise equivalent properties. Note that the economic issues are more complex than the legal issues since the expected future cost of property taxes is reflected in the purchase price.

California's Proposition 4: The Gann Limit

In the wake of the passage of Prop 13 in 1978, Paul Gann - one of the two sponsors of Prop 13 - put Prop 4 on the ballot. Prop 4 imposed a spending limit-by-formula on state government and contained other features. If revenues exceeded the limit, tax rebates were required. Prop 4 passed but spending dropped well below the limit during the budget crisis of the early 1980s. However, during Gov. George Deukmejian's second term, a rebate was triggered. Thereafter, under the later Propositions 98 and 111, the Gann Limit was largely gutted. The limit played no role in state fiscal affairs until the dot-com boom substantially boosted state revenues and spending. It appears in hindsight that the limit may have been exceeded at the peak of the boom, but no rebate was triggered. The budget crisis of the early 2000s again meant that spending has been well below the limit. There have been gubernatorial attempts to enact initiatives with spending limits under Governors Reagan, Wilson, and Schwarzenegger. All of these failed. Prop 4 is the only such initiative to pass.

Budget Crises Under California Governor Deukmejian
George Deukmejian became governor of California in Jan. 1983, inheriting a budget crisis from outgoing governor Jerry Brown. Deukmejian would not raise taxes (although he did allow various revenue enhancements through closing of "loopholes). A stalemate over the budget erupted in July 1983 when the state began its fiscal year with no budget in place. However, budget pressures were basically relieved as the economy recovered. When he was up for re-election in 1986, Deukmejian could claim to have taken the state from "IOU to A-OK." By the end of his second term in 1990, however, things were no longer A-OK. The end of the Cold War and the resulting squeeze on military spending - combined with a national recession - created a new budget crisis and stalemate, inherited by Deukmejian's successor, Pete Wilson. These three news clips illustrate the crises that characterized the start and end of the Deukmejian years.

George Deukmejian was elected governor of California in 1982 and took over during a major state budget crisis. By the time he ran for re-election in 1986, he could claim having taken the state from "IOU to A-OK." Unfortunately, as the Cold War ended and the U.S. economy went into recession in the early 1990s, the state suffered another major budget crisis which was left to the next governor - Pete Wilson - to deal with. In these comments made in 2005, Deukmejian reflects on the problems of the state budget.

Reagan’s Proposition 1 ads

07:12

In 1973, California Governor Ronald Reagan called a special election for Proposition 1, an initiative to cap the state budget using a formula linked to personal income. The campaign used mass recorded phone calls, one aimed at general voters and another aimed at Republicans. The phone ads were an expensive campaign device, in part because call recipients were invited after the governor’s message to talk to an operator and volunteer for the campaign. There were also a series of radio ads. The phone and radio ads are included here. Prop 1 failed at the ballot box.
http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=kyYoaTmN5pU

In 1973, California Governor Ronald Reagan campaigned for Proposition 1, a complicated state spending limit by formula. There had been talk of having such a limit placed in the federal constitution at the time; Prop 1 can be regarded as a state version of that idea. Prop 1 was defeated but it foreshadowed the Gann Limit proposition of 1979 which was passed by voters. Later, however, Gann was largely gutted by Props 98 (1988) and 111 (1990). Discussion of a tighter spending limit was periodically revived thereafter but ballot efforts failed. As part of the California state budget crisis of 2011, there was again talk about a budget deal that might include some version of a revised Gann-type limit. Sounds of the 2008-08 California Budget Crisis 09:50 By 2008, California was in a budget crisis similar to the one in the early 2000s that led to the recall of Governor Gray Davis and his replacement by Arnold Schwarzenegger. In these clips we hear radio ads early in the budget process designed to press the legislature not to cut certain programs. Governor Schwarzenegger laments lack of spending priorities, raids on special funds, and lack of a rainy day fund. He indicates he is against a tax increase. Subsequently, after a long overdue budget, rumors appear that he will propose a sales tax increase. On a radio program interview, the governor retorts that charges that he has not been sufficiently focused on the budget is right-wing nonsense. He urges compromise. Schwarzenegger later did propose a tax increase but he could not get support from Republicans in the legislature. Although Republicans are a minority in the legislature, there is a requirement of 2/3 to pass a budget so the tax increase was defeated and a budget was signed without one. By late October, word was leaked that there would need to be a special session of the legislature since the newly-enacted budget was significantly out of balance.

Prop 49: The 2002 Schwarzenegger After-School Initiative

03:21 In 2002, before the possibility of election via recall was under consideration, Arnold Schwarzenegger was considering a run for California governor. His advisors suggested he put an initiative on the ballot to introduce him as a political figure to California voters. The result was Prop 49, which earmarks by formula funding for after-school activities. (A good history of this episode can be found in Joe Mathews' book "The People's Machine, 2006.) Prop 49 was endorsed in 2002 by the California Teachers Assn. But when he was elected governor in the 2003 recall, Schwarzenegger did not keep a deal with CTA to fund education fully in the 2004-05 budget. As a result, CTA opposed Schwarzenegger during his 2005 "Year of Reform" campaign for 4 ballot initiatives, two of which were aimed at CTA. The teacher who appeared in the 2002 pro-Prop 49 ad seen in this clip thus appeared in an anti-Schwarzenegger ad in 2005. That ad is also shown. The sheriff of Orange County endorsed Prop 49 in the prop-49 ad. But as a portion of this clip shows, he was subsequently indicted for corruption and then resigned. The latest in the odd history of Prop 49 came in the much-delayed budget crisis deal of mid-Sept. 2008. As part of the budget compromise, elements are slated to be approved in a special election. Reports suggest that modification of Prop 49 is to be part of that special election.

Gov. Schwarzenegger's 2008-09 Budget Veto - Part 1

03:23

The 2008-09 California state budget was not enacted at the start of the fiscal year: July 1. After a record delay of two and a half months, the legislature enacted a budget which Governor Arnold Schwarzenegger announced he would veto. Budgets and tax increases in California require a 2/3 vote. To override the veto, a 2/3 vote is also needed. During the budget crisis, Gov. Schwarzenegger called for long term fiscal reform which would include an enhanced rainy day fund. However, since the state had no surplus, a rainy day fund would not resolve the immediate 2008-09 crisis. Earlier in the budget negotiations, Gov. Schwarzenegger seemed to want enhanced power to cut the budget, a power that would address the short term problem. However, this demand was not mentioned when the intent to veto was announced. Part 1 is the opening statement by the governor on the veto. Part 2 is the question and answer session with reporters. Note that although the governor says in his message that he expects his veto to be overridden, in fact, a face-saving compromise was reached with the legislature shortly thereafter.

Prop 13's Jarvis Seems to Endorse Rival Candidates: 1978

02:28

Howard Jarvis, co-sponsor of California's Proposition 13 with Paul Gann, seemed to endorse both gubernatorial candidates in the November 1978 election. Prop 13 drastically cut and limited property taxes. Incumbent Governor Jerry Brown (Democrat) opposed Prop 13 when it was on the June 1978 ballot. But after it passed, he said he would make Prop 13 work. Brown - who was seeking re-election - was pitted against state Attorney General Evelle Younger (Republican) in the fall gubernatorial race. Both candidates hoped for Jarvis' endorsement.

"Professor" Schwarzenegger Explains His Budget Proposal 2008
07:02
In his 2008 State of the State speech, California Governor Arnold Schwarzenegger proposed a constitutional amendment regarding the state budget. The proposed amendment was similar to one he proposed in 2005 that rejected by voters. It involves creating a "rainy day" fund during good times to finance spending when the economy turns down. Also involved is a provision for interim budget cuts during periods of fiscal stress. Voters have been resistant to budget caps in the past, for example, under governors Reagan and Wilson. Gov. Schwarzenegger also defended his cutting of the "car tax" when he took office in 2003. The car tax provided revenue to local governments, although it was collected by the state. When the tax was cut, the state had to compensation localities for the lost revenue out of its general fund.
http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=eh7Qfrh97gU
Due to legislative stalemate, the California budget for fiscal year 2007-08 (beginning July 1, 2007) was not passed and signed by Governor Schwarzenegger until late August 2007. At the time, as the first part of this clip shows, the budget was characterized as balanced and with a significant reserve. It was soon apparent - if not already apparent - that the budget was in fact in deficit. By the time the budget proposal for fiscal year 2008-09 was made on Jan. 10, 2007, the governor called for cuts in the current (2007-08) budget, cuts billed as 10% in 2008-09. The governor pledged no new taxes although his proposal called for an added "fee" on property insurance for fire safety. It also called for selling the remaining deficit bonds approved by the voters in 2004. He called for a constitutional amendment - a variant of one he proposed unsuccessfully in 2005 - that would limit spending and establish a "rainy day" fund. Despite the promise of no new taxes (apart from the insurance fee), there was some hint that a deal might be struck involving enactment of the constitutional amendment in exchange for a tax increase. In the second part of this clip, the governor appears to say that tax increases should not be considered unless there is structural reform, i.e., his budget amendment. Note: Both clips are edited.

California passed a substantially unbalanced state budget two and a half months late in Sept. 2008. Because of the fiscal emergency, Governor Schwarzenegger called a special budget session of the legislature in Nov. 2008. It failed to enact a new budget. The task thus fell to the new legislative session beginning in Dec. 2008. As that session began, State Treasurer Bill Lockyer indicated that because cash had been borrowed from accounts that finance infrastructure construction, such construction would halt. He indicated the state could not borrow unless a new budget was enacted. Estimates were that the state would run out of cash by March 2009.

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=SfkQbHihsDk
In June 1978, California voters enacted Proposition 13, which substantially cut local property taxes and required a 2/3 vote for tax increases. Gov. Jerry Brown then proposed a temporary bail out of local governments using a reserve the state had built up, as well as budget cuts.

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=xCueOgnluDg

California began having budget problems as early as 2007. The financial crisis of 2008 worsened the problem. The state postponed payments of some obligations in winter 2009 but a budget deal in February 2009 temporarily ended that episode. However, the deal involved various ballot propositions put to voters in May 2009. All of the significant propositions were rejected. Meanwhile, revenue declines continued. By summer 2009, the state began issuing IOUs (registered warrants) for various bills and obligations. This video shows excerpts from that episode. This is Part 1. The video continues in Part 2.

In Feb. 2009, the California legislature revised its existing budget to reflect the deteriorating revenue situation. Part of the deal was to place 6 propositions on the ballot on May 19, 2009, a date that coincided with a municipal election in Los Angeles. The propositions were politically calculated to attract support of the California Teachers Association and avoid its opposition. (The CTA's opposition was an important element in defeating various initiatives of Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger in 2005.) The propositions did succeed in obtaining CTA support, but other unions opposed some or all of the propositions. All but one were defeated in the end, leaving the state with a major fiscal crisis. This is Part 1. Shown in the 3 parts are news accounts, TV and radio ads favoring and opposing the propositions, and comments by elected officials, candidates, and others. At the end of Part 3, we see the front page of the LA Times with headlines about the budget crisis after the election and an ad for the latest Terminator move at the bottom.

California's Feb. 2009 Budget Crisis Deal: Reactions Before & After
California found itself in a budget crisis during the 2008-09 fiscal year. The initial budget for 2008-09 was delayed two and a half months by legislative stalemate. When finally enacted in September 2008, it was seriously out of balance. A special session to deal with the budget called by Governor Arnold Schwarzenegger failed to produce a solution. When the new legislative session began in December 2008, the unresolved budget crisis was still on the table. Eventually, a new deal was passed in February 2009. The deal called for tax increases, borrowing, and other items and a series of propositions to be put on the ballot for approval in May 2009. Under California's constitution, a two thirds vote is required in the legislature to pass budgets or raise taxes. Although Republicans are in the minority, they had more than one third of each house. A few Republicans broke ranks to endorse the deal. This video clip contains two radio ads aired before the deal, one aimed at pressing the legislature to avoid tax increases and the other to avoid budget spending cuts. We then see the signing ceremony for the new budget which ostensibly is supposed to cover both the 2008-09 and 2009-10 fiscal years. Finally, we see excerpts from a post-deal anti-tax/anti-budget rally organized by John and Ken, two Los Angeles radio personalities who broadcast on KFI. John and Ken call for the recall of the governor and various Republican legislators. At the time of the rally, it remained unclear how much funding would be available on the pro or anti sides of the May 2009 budget propositions.

At a press conference on Jan. 25, 2010, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger discussed a budget proposal to allow more offshore drilling in California in order to generate more budget revenue. The governor had recently included this proposal in the budget message for 2010-11. That budget was not enacted until October 2010, over 3 months late. By that time, the governor had abandoned the offshore drilling idea due to the BP blowout in the Gulf of Mexico.

Week 4: Health/Income

Workers' Compensation Insurance in California: Early 1990s
03:16
The issue of the cost of Workers' Compensation insurance surfaces periodically in California, particularly during recessions. Workers' Comp developed in the early 20th century to compensate workers injured in industrial accidents which were widespread at the time. It was supposed to be "no-fault" insurance. California was an early adopter of Workers' Comp, as part of the progressive reforms (initiative, referendum, recall, right to vote for women) after the election of Hiram Johnson as governor in 1910. The system in practice, however, often involves litigation. At the time this clip was made, California paradoxically featured high costs for the insurance and low benefits for seriously injured workers. The paradox was due to a bleeding off of the revenues to compensate relatively minor injuries and questionable claims such as job "stress." As the opening titles point out, the job loss in California in this period was due mainly to the state's recession which reflected a national recession and the loss of aerospace and other military-related jobs when the Cold War ended. Reforming Workers' Comp was a major goal of Governor Pete Wilson, shown briefly in this clip. Workers' Comp resurfaced as an issue after Governor Schwarzenegger was elected in 2003 - also a period of economic sluggishness reflecting in part the dot-com bust.

Initial Justice for Janitors Union Contract in L.A.
The Justice for Janitors union organizing campaign by the SEIU had its most notable early success in Los Angeles. The feature film, "Bread and Roses," depicts an early and humorous organizing tactic involving embarrassing building owners and managers. Despite the humor, the tactic was not especially successful. What was successful were street demonstrations, particularly one in the Century City office complex in 1990. The police reaction to that event produced much public sympathy and political support and ultimately an initial contract.

This video depicts an immigrant doctor from the Philippines who takes a job as a nurse in California and earns more money as a result. The health insurance issue has come and gone at the national level as well as the state level over the years. In the early 1990s, the Clinton administration proposed a plan involving an employer mandate. The TV ads shown below were a major part of the opposition campaign.

Harry and Louise on Clinton's health plan
01:00
TV ads featuring "Harry and Louise" helped defeat the Clinton health plan in 1994. The ads were funded by a group of insurance companies who feared they would be cut out of the market by larger firms.
http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Dt31nhleeCg
In early 2007, Governor Schwarzenegger proposed that California enact some form of universal health insurance. That set in motion a debate over what kind of plan it might be. The governor favored a plan based on the Massachusetts concept of mandated individual coverage. Legislative Democrats pushed for employer-based coverage. By the middle of 2007, TV ads appeared favoring doing "something," but unclear as to what that something should be. A radio ad also appeared that seemed to follow the Harry & Louise format. It urged caution about doing something.

Proposition 226 was on California's June 1998 primary ballot. This video was produced for union members as part of an anti-226 campaign. The proposition would have required explicit individual member permission for unions to use dues for political purposes. Although the proposition originally polled well, it was defeated by unions in a major campaign effort. The success in defeating Prop 226 seemed to mark an uptick in union political activities in California, including the election in November 1998 of Gray Davis as governor. Davis's successor, Arnold Schwarzenegger, placed a similar proposition (this one confined to public sector unions) on the ballot in Nov. 2005, along with other propositions during the "Year of Reform" effort. All were defeated.

Excerpts: News Conference on California Health Plan - Part 1
06:59
On December 17, 2007, a news conference with Governor Arnold Schwarzenegger and others was held after the California State Assembly passed a "universal" health insurance plan modeled after the Massachusetts plan. The plan was based on an individual mandate to have insurance, an employer play-or-pay system, and a variety of taxes and subsidies. The taxes could not be passed by the legislature because under Proposition 13, state tax increases require a 2/3 vote. With all legislative Republicans opposed, the Democratic majority (and the Republican Governor) could not pass the tax component. The tax component was thus to be put on the November 2008 ballot. This clip is an edited-down version of the news conference. Part 1 consists of edited remarks by the governor and Assembly speaker. Part 2 consists of remarks by the president of the Service Employees International Union (SEIU), Andy Stern, and CEO chairman Steve Burd. It is notable that both worked together on the health insurance matter since unions previously regarded Burd as the villain in the Southern California supermarket strike of 2003 - fought partly over the issue of health insurance. Finally, Part 3 consists of remarks by Fresno Mayor Alan Autry, a Republican who is bucking his part on this issue (along with the Governor). Despite the mood of celebration at this meeting, in January 2008, a California Senate committee rejected the bill with all Republicans and all but one Democrat opposed. Fears about potential costs of the plan were raised as well as general concerns about the deterioration of the California state budget. That action killed the bill. This is Part 1 of 3 parts on the December 2007 event.

The lengthy 2003 Southern California supermarket strike attracted substantial attention, in part because of the health insurance issue. Employers pushed for a two-tier wage and benefit plan including limited health care for new hires. The local unions in Southern California of the United Food and Commercial Workers had not had a strike for many years and seemed uncoordinated. The Teamsters - under a separate contract - for a time honored UFCW picket lines but eventually returned to work. There was considerable public support for the strike and business was diverted to nonunion stores and stores that were not part of the strike. Litigation arose due to a mutual assistance pact among the 3 supermarket chains involved and due to use of some returning strikers under false Social Security numbers. Eventually, the union accepted the 2-tier deal. During the next round of negotiations in 2007, the two-tier element was largely removed. Here are 4 news clips during the strike/lockout.

California Gov. Earl Warren Comments on Inequality & Right Wing Politics in 1952

In a radio interview on Jan. 3, 1952, California Governor Earl Warren - a dark horse candidate for the Republican presidential nomination - complains about right wing forces trying to dominate the GOP and about failure to discuss issues such as inequality. The frontrunners for the nomination were Eisenhower and Robert Taft. Warren hoped the two leading candidates would deadlock at the convention, giving him - with control of the California delegation - the nomination. (He had been the Republican VP candidate, running with Thomas Dewey, in 1948.) Ultimately, the convention nominated Eisenhower who went on to win. But as part of a convention deal, Warren was named by Eisenhower as chief justice of the U.S. Supreme Court in 1953.

A California Prognosis During WW2: Part One
05:24
This video looks at what the future might be for California after World War II ends. Would there be enough jobs given the rapid population growth that was occurring? What industries might take up the slack when military spending ended? The post-WW2 Cold War was not foreseen. References are made to opportunities for trade with Russia and China. Nuclear energy - surprisingly - is seen as an alternative to hydro (and this is before Hiroshima.) The movie industry is recognized as important for the future. References are made to prewar social movements such as EPIC and the Ham & Eggs pension scheme and religious movements. This is Part One.

Civil War Draft Riots Compared With 1992 Los Angeles Riots
06:13
The Civil War draft riots in New York City and the L.A. riots of 1992 are widely viewed as the most severe urban disturbances in U.S. history. Both involved substantial racial conflict and looting, whatever the initial grievances may have been. In the Civil War case, Irish immigrants were particularly vulnerable to the draft because they could not afford to buy themselves out of it. They blamed African-Americans for the War, especially after the Emancipation Proclamation. In the LA case, African-Americans attacked Korean-owned businesses and there was widespread multicultural looting. http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=4CBHAlwFGmuw

Earl Warren's Son, Also a Judge, Makes National News in 1969
An unusual court proceeding presided over by Municipal Judge Earl Warren Jr. - son of the famous Chief Justice of the US Supreme Court and former governor of California - took place in Sacramento, California. Story told by New York radio commentator Jean Shepherd on WOR, Sept. 1969. The incident reflects the changing social attitudes of the period and the "sexual revolution" of the 1960s. Calif. Gov. Schwarzenegger Proposes to Raise Higher Education Funding by Cutting Prison Costs
In his Jan. 6, 2010 State of the State address, California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger proposed a state constitutional amendment to raise higher education funding through cuts in prison spending. The amendment would ultimately raise spending on the University of California system and the California State University system to 10% of the general fund. It would require that the state pay more for higher education than for prisons. The governor pushed prison privatization as the funding mechanism in his address. Constitutional amendments can appear on the ballot via legislative action or by petition. Considerable campaign funding is typically required. It is not clear who would fund such a campaign.

California's 1934 EPIC Campaign for Governor - Part One
07:47
In 1934, author Upton Sinclair ran for governor in the EPIC campaign (End Poverty in California). He received the Democratic nomination as this video shows but was ultimately defeated. A major campaign to defeat Sinclair was set in motion by panicked business interests and traditional Democrats who resented the takeover of their party. However, Sinclair's campaign changed California politics, making the Democrats the majority party. The EPIC agenda consisted of a state-takeover of depression-idled businesses and farms, to be financed by a vague currency scheme. The businesses were to be converted to nonprofit cooperatives. In 1938, one of the EPIC Democrats elected to the Legislature became governor for one term: Culbert Olson. The EPIC campaign can be seen as one of the various pensionite and other social movements spawned by the Great Depression in California. This is Part One. (Sam Yorty who is interviewed in this clip was later mayor of Los Angeles.)

The Townsend Pension Plan in the 1930s
07:24
During the Great Depression of the 1930s, most elderly people had little means of support. Job-based pensions were rare. The Townsend movement - a proposal to pay everyone over age 60 $200/month (a vast sum at the time) - began in California and spread across the country. It became the radical alternative to the Social Security proposal in Congress and indirectly helped enact Social Security as the more moderate plan. For more info on California's various pensionite movements, see Mitchell, "Pensions, Politics, and the Elderly" (M.E. Sharpe, 2000).

California Pensionite Movements Reflected in Movie
07:45
The film "Meet John Doe" appears to be based on California pensionite movements such as the Townsend Plan and Ham & Eggs. These involved formation of clubs around the state (and nation in the case of Townsend) to support the movement. Ham & Eggs involved a plan to pay every state resident over age 50 Thirty Dollars Every Thursday. (The plan appeared on the ballot in 1938 and 1939.) There is a vague reference in the film to this notion. Moreover, the suicide theme in the film was based on an actual incident seized on by Ham & Eggs supporters. For more info on California pensionites, see Mitchell, "Pensions, Politics, and the Elderly" (M.E. Sharpe, 2000).

Hit Song from High Noon Changes Hollywood Business Model
09:51
The film "High Noon" (1952) contained an opening theme song that became a hit single record, initially in two versions (Frankie Lane, Tex Ritter). This audio narrative - originally on NPR - argues that the success of the song on its own changed the Hollywood business model with regard to film scores and songs. It is argued that the success of the song underlined the synergy between film (including film promotion and marketing) and the music business, leading to a combination of the two. It also notes a technological change, the move from 78 RPM records to long-playing records which created a larger demand for recorded music. Oddly, the narrative doesn't refer to competition from television, which was of much concern to Hollywood at the time. But it does argue that antitrust litigation that had ended vertical integration between film studios and theater distribution also contributed to the search for new marketing techniques. Finally, reference is made to the (longstanding) globalization of Hollywood films.

California and the Medfly Infestation in the Early 1980s
01:45
An infestation of the Mediterranean fruitfly began to threaten California's large agricultural industry in 1980. By that time, however, environmentalism had achieved a major foothold in the state's urban areas. There was strong resistance to aerial spraying and the use of pesticide. The controversy limited the anti-Medfly efforts. Eventually, the infestation and the controversy over attempts to eradicate the Medfly in urban areas spilled over into state politics. Democratic Governor Jerry Brown was planning to run for the US Senate in 1982. Along with a deteriorating state budget, the Medfly controversy became a significant element in Brown's campaign against Republican Pete Wilson. Wilson ultimately won the race. This news video on the Medfly was made in early January 1981. For more on the Medfly problem, see:

The 2007 strike seemed focused on new technologies for distribution such as DVDs. In contrast, the 1988 news reports mainly focus on TV networks vs. cable and first runs vs. reruns. Oddly, in the second clip, a major NBC executive refers to replacement writers hired by management as "scabs," a derogatory term more typically used by unions.

Pete Wilson’s Two Campaigns for Governor: 1990 and 1994
05:26
Pete Wilson ran for California’s governor successfully in 1990 and for reelection successfully in 1994. He had been mayor of San Diego and a U.S. Senator before assuming the governorship. In both gubernatorial elections he ran against women. His opponent in 1990 was Dianne Feinstein, former mayor of San Francisco and later U.S. Senator. The 1994 opponent was Kathleen Brown, sister of former governor of Jerry Brown and daughter of former governor Pat Brown. In the 1994 election, the issue of illegal immigrant became a major factor. Wilson endorsed Proposition 187 which would have denied most public services to illegal immigrants. Prop 187 passed but was largely voided by litigation.

California's 1958 Right-to-Work Initiative TV opposition ad

00:41

This brief clip shows a TV ad opposing a right-to-work initiative on the 1958 California ballot - supported by Republican candidate for governor William Knowland. The initiative would have banned the "union shop" in California. Knowland was minority leader in the U.S. senate and hoped to use the California governorship as a springboard to the presidency. He forced the incumbent Republican governor, Goodwin (Goody) Knight to run for Knowland's senator seat while Knowland ran for Knight's position. Knowland's insistence on this switch and his support for the right-to-work initiative (which was defeated) killed the careers of himself and Knight. And it led to the victory of Pat Brown for governor and other Democrats.

Hollywood on Elections in 1972

05:34

In "The Candidate" (1972) a liberal Democrat runs for U.S. senator from California and wins. Actual political figures and news reporters of that era were used in the film. Some are identified here. The candidate himself has doubts during the campaign which compound when he wins. He is supposed to be the son of a past governor. Four years after the film was made, Jerry Brown, son of former Gov. Pat Brown, was elected governor - not senator. When Jerry Brown ran for the senate, however, in 1982, he was not elected. He was elected state Attorney General in 2006.

Governor Schwarzenegger's 2005 "Concession" Speech
In 2005, California Governor Arnold Schwarzenegger supported four "Year of Reform" initiatives on the ballot, all of which were defeated. On Election Day evening, after enough returns were in to make it clear that the initiatives were failing, he gave an odd "concession" speech. In the early part of the speech, he seemed not to recognize the defeat and spoke of waiting for late returns. But towards the end of the speech, he began talking about state infrastructure needs. Although wage and price controls that had been imposed by President Nixon were largely ended in 1974, elaborate price controls on oil continued, producing a gasoline shortage. The shortage led to long lines at gasoline stations, particularly in California and rationing through "odd-even" plans based on license plate numbers. Gov. Jerry Brown went to Washington in May 1979 to complain to President Carter about the gasoline situation. Brown was a potential rival to Carter in the 1980 Democratic presidential primary, although he did not formally announce his candidacy until later in the year. In this clip, we also see California Senator S.I. Hiyakawa expressing his views on the shortage.

Jerry Brown was elected governor of California in Nov. 1974, succeeding Ronald Reagan. He quickly attracted national attention as these news clips illustrate. Brown was noted for his presidential ambitions, his "small is beautiful" philosophy, and fiscal conservatism. Part I contains news clips covering those issues. Part II also covers Brown's controversial appointment of Rose Bird as Chief Justice of the state Supreme Court and his opposition to the death penalty. The state's budget surplus later became an issue in the campaign for Proposition 13 in 1978. The fact that the state was running a surplus as local property tax bills rose rapidly was a factor in the vote for Prop 13. On the other hand, the accumulated surplus at the state level initially helped the bailing out of local governments as Prop 13 reduced their property tax revenues.

California Gov. Pat Brown & Jerry Brown Discuss Defeat of Nixon in 1962 with JFK
5:01
In a phone conversation on Nov. 7, 1962, California Gov. Pat Brown discusses his recent defeat of Richard Nixon in the 1962 gubernatorial election. Brown was running for reelection against Nixon. Nixon gave a press conference after the election denouncing the news media as biased against him. Brown and Kennedy think Nixon is a "nut" and "paranoid" and that his political career is washed up. Toward the end of the conversation, Pat Brown puts his then young son Jerry Brown on the phone. Jerry Brown became governor in the 1970s and again was elected in 2010. Jerry Brown tells JFK that he (JFK) will carry California in the 1964 presidential election. (Of course, Kennedy was assassinated and never got to run in 1964.) The recording is on a defective dictabelt which used a needle-in-groove technology. The deterioration of the dictabelt causes the needle to skip so words repeat.

Jerry Brown Makes a Political Comeback in California: 1989
02:05
Jerry Brown served two terms as California's governor in the late 1970s and early 1980s. He ran for US Senate in 1982 against Republican Pete Wilson and lost. At the time, the state was in a major budget crisis. After an absence of 7 years, Brown won the position of chair of the California Democratic Party, restarting his political career. He was later elected Mayor of Oakland and subsequently California state attorney general. Brown is thought to be a possible contender for what would be a third term as governor in 2010. Although the voters imposed term limits by initiative in 1990, Brown's earlier terms as governor which predate that time do not preclude a third term.

In 1982, two-term Governor Jerry Brown ran for the US Senate against San Diego Mayor Pete Wilson. President Reagan supported Republican Wilson. Brown was facing a major state budget crisis and controversy over aerial spraying for Medflies, among other issues. California Chief Justice Rose Bird Loses Election
Appointees to the California State Supreme Court must periodically stand for confirmation by the voters. Rose Bird was first appointed Chief Justice by Governor Jerry Brown in 1977 and was immediately controversial. She was narrowly confirmed in 1978, but not in 1986 when she lost 2-to-1, and took down two other Justices in the same election. The major issue was her refusal to uphold death penalty cases. However, Governor George Deukmejian and others were upset by her votes on such matters as redistricting, Proposition 13 (the initiative that cut property taxes), and other matters. In this news report we see Los Angeles Mayor Tom Bradley, then running for governor in a rematch against Deukmejian, saying he was neutral in the Bird race. We also see Howard Jarvis, co-author of Proposition 13, as an opponent of Bird. After losing, Bird largely disappeared from public view until she died in 1999.

During a major state budget crisis, a petition drive - financed in large part by Congressman Darrell Issa - was launched to recall California Governor Gray Davis. Issa hoped to win the governorship through the recall but eventually dropped out when Arnold Schwarzenegger ran and became the major Republican candidate. (The chief Democrat in the race was Lt. Governor Cruz Bustamante.) Schwarzenegger had been considering running for governor in a more conventional manner and it was first thought he might not run in the recall and instead support former Los Angeles Mayor Richard Riordan. Part 1 shows the petition drive and the certification of the recall. Part 2 features campaign clips. Part 3 shows the results of the recall and the inauguration of Governor Schwarzenegger. In that clip, the new governor mentions his action in cutting the "car tax," a form of property tax on automobiles. Criticism of this action revived as California entered a new budget crisis during the 2007-08 fiscal year during the governor's second term.

Illegal Immigration Issue in California May 2010 GOP US Senate Primary Debate

The 3 California GOP candidates for the US Senate held by Barbara Boxer held a debate in May 2010. Illegal immigration came up twice in the debate, once in regard to an Arizona state law that aimed at curbing such immigration and once on the issue of amnesty. The candidates were Tom Campbell, Chuck DeVore, and Carly Fiorina. (There was no debate on the Democratic side since incumbent Senator Boxer had only minor opposition.)

California GOP Governor and US Senate Candidates Debate Gun Rights: May 2010

Note: A typo in one of the titles on this video says 2009 rather than 2010 - sorry. The issue of gun rights arose in the Republican pre-primary debates of May 2010 for the California governorship and the US Senate seat held by Sen. Barbara Boxer. In the US Senate race, the issue of gun rights for individuals on the federal no-fly list arose. In the gubernatorial race, the issue of a propose limit on “open carry” rights arose. In this clip we see the gun-related sections of both debates. US Senate candidates were Tom Campbell, Chuck DeVore, and Carly Fiorina. Gubernatorial candidates are Steve Poizner and Meg Whitman. Note: The Democratic side in both races had essentially no contests so there were no debates.

Audio Artifact from the 1983 Santa Monica City Council Election & Rent Control Wars
Audio Artifact from the 1983 Santa Monica City Council Election & Rent Control Wars
Part of the campaign involved a cassette tape mailed to voters by the "All Santa Monica Coalition." The cassette is narrated by Susan F. Rice of the Coalition and features a recording of a meeting at which Derek Shearer and Ruth Yannatta Goldway of the Renters Rights group spoke to a group of activists. All three individuals went on to notable careers.
As of 2011, Susan F. Rice was Senior Consulting Associate at Brakeley Briscoe, a fundraising and organization management firm. At UCLA, she directed the management school component of UCLA's capital campaign. She is a past president of the California League of Women Voters. Her husband at the time of the campaign was CEO of the Rand Corporation in Santa Monica. At the time of the 1983 campaign, she was active in the Coalition.
Ambassador Derek Shearer as of 2011 was Chevalier Professor of Diplomacy and World Affairs at Occidental College in Los Angeles. He also serves as Director of Global Affairs, handling the college’s international relations and directing the expansion of its international affairs programs. Derek Shearer served in the Clinton administration as an economics official in the Commerce Department, and then as Ambassador to Finland (1994-97). He was active in the Renters Rights group at the time of the 1983 campaign.
Ruth Yannatta Goldway was designated Chairman of the United States Postal Regulatory Commission (PRC) by President Barack Obama on August 6, 2009. She was first appointed by President Clinton in April 1998 to the predecessor agency, the Postal Rate Commission, and twice reappointed by President George W. Bush, most recently in 2008 to serve a third term ending in November 2014. She was a Renters Rights member of the Santa Monica City Council at the time of the 1983 campaign.
Background: In 1978, California voters enacted Proposition 13 which dramatically cut local property taxes. Part of the campaign for Prop 13 involved suggesting to renters that when their landlords' property taxes went down, rents would also decrease. However, Prop 13 changed neither demand nor supply of rental properties and rents were not reduced. Indeed, in the inflationary climate of the late 1970s, they kept rising. The result was a spate of rent control laws in California. Prior to that point, Santa Monica had been a relatively conservative city. The rent control issue changed the climate and the City's politics shifted dramatically. A particularly tight rent control law was adopted and a group known as Santa Monicans for Renters Rights took over the city council.
The 1983 city council campaign was particularly bitter as the audio cassette indicates. After the 1983 election, the council was divided 4-3 with the Renters Rights group retaining a majority. The Renters Rights group has retained a considerable influence in city politics thereafter. A subsequent change in state law mandating vacancy decontrol (properties go to market rates when a renter moves out) diminished the importance of rent control in local politics. (Costa/Hawkins Rental Housing Act of 1996).

Part 1 of 2: Radio broadcast in 1948 featuring California Governor Earl Warren who was running for the Republican presidential nomination. NBC gave Warren free time for an address. Under the fairness doctrine of that era, it had to give similar time to the other candidates. Warren’s address touches on such issues as the developing Cold War and Social Security. Warren represented the liberal wing of the Party and pushes for the Party to be “progressive.” Implicit in his remarks is criticism of the more conservative and isolationist wing of the Party. Ultimately, Warren became the vice presidential candidate, running with Thomas Dewey as the presidential candidate. The ticket lost to incumbent President Harry Truman.

University of California Regents Abolish Affirmative Action

In 1995, the Regents of the University of California abolished affirmative action in student admissions. The regental action was later followed by Proposition 209 which abolished affirmative action at all state and local entities in California (including the University. Regent Ward Connerly, who appears briefly in this clip, was the major figure behind the regental action and Prop 209. The action was also a major goal of Governor Pete Wilson. When Prop 209 was adopted by voters, the regental policy became redundant and was revoked as a kind of symbolic gesture. State and local entities in California - including the University - remain subject to federal affirmative action rules regarding hiring.

The 1960 Master Plan for Higher Education in California created a formal tripartite system of Community Colleges (2 year "junior" colleges), State Colleges (now known as the Calif. The state portion of executive pay can be capped, she seems to agree, but the Regents should then be free to raise private donations for increments of pay above the state portion. She argues that UC will need high-quality leadership and must be free to compete. She expresses skepticism about psychic income. Brown responds at length with a learned discourse ranging from his one-time vow of Jesuit poverty to the history of higher education in California and more generally. He is uncertain about what terms such as "quality" mean in the context of research. He questions rankings of educational institutions. Brown also talks about his support for high-speed rail, the need for water infrastructure to avoid floods, and global warming. He says we don't really know where online higher education will lead but that we should go for it (anyway). On the other hand, he is skeptical about the need for a new medical school at UC-Riverside. He cites the two-decade holiday of contributions to the UC pension fund as showing that even smart people can make bad decisions.

A note on public speaking for teams making oral reports:

Southern California's "Valley Girl" Speech Persists (and men do it, too!)
01:51

"Valley Girl" speech persists in conversation - as this clip shows - but is best not used in formal presentations, public speaking, or job interviews. The "valley" refers to the San Fernando Valley in Los Angeles County.

From Wikipedia entry: Valspeak is a common name for a now partially universal American sociolect, originally of Southern Californian's, in particular valley girls. This stereotype originated in the 1970s, but was at its peak in the 1980s and lost popularity in the late 1990s and 2000s. Though for a brief period a national fad, many phrases and elements of Valspeak, along with surfer slang and skateboarding slang, are stable elements of the California English dialect lexicon, and in some cases wider American English (such as the widespread use of "like" as conversational filler). Elements of valspeak can now be found virtually everywhere English is spoken, particularly among young native English speakers. The term "Valley Girl" and the Valley manner of speech was given a wider circulation with the release of a hit single by Frank Zappa entitled "Valley Girl," on which Moon Zappa, Frank's fourteen-year-old daughter, delivered a monologue of meaningless phrases in "valspeak" behind the music. This song, Frank Zappa's only Top 40 hit in the United States, popularized phrases such as "grody to the max". Some of the terms used by Moon were not actually Valley phrases, but were surfer terms instead (such as "tubular" and "gnarly"). But due to the song's popularity, some of the surfer phrases actually entered the speech of real Valley teens after this point. The Los Angeles surfing subculture, on the other hand, did not generally begin using the Valley terms. Valspeak is used heavily in the 1995 film Clueless and quite a lot in Wayne's World.

Intonation: Excessive use of high rising terminal. Statements have rising intonation, causing normal declarative language to appear to the listener as interrogative. Also known as "uptalking" or the "moronic interrogative."
