The Future of Federal Housing Policy

Part of the Housing, Equity and Community Series

Much of the work of urban planning and policymaking takes place at the state and local level, with the impacts playing out in cities and neighborhoods. But decisions made in cities are also heavily influenced (and funded) by federal policies and programs, and the upcoming election provides sharply contrasting visions for the future of U.S. housing policy.

As former mayor of San Antonio and Secretary of Housing and Urban Development during the Obama administration, Julián Castro has unique insight into the federal government's role in promoting fair housing and housing affordability and equity.

Join the UCLA Lewis Center and UCLA Ziman Center for a conversation with Secretary Castro about his vision for housing in the U.S. and how it intersects with work being done in Southern California.
